The method has to work for any predefined x and y values. A: This is somewhat cumbersome, but here goes. You can build a grid yourself which you know is dense enough to cover the area you want to map, and then just check if the ray intersects each square of the grid. The reason this is cumbersome is that as you run in one direction along the ray, you need to check for intersections only in the smaller squares. Each smaller square has a smaller angle of entry and will have a smaller chance of intersecting the ray. If you go too far along the ray without checking the smaller squares, you'll miss the chance of intersecting the larger squares. This can be mitigated by limiting the number of checks you do per ray direction, and by adjusting the size of the check squares according to the number of checks you do per ray direction. How you choose the distance the ray checks ahead will of course depend on the distance the ray moves in each unit of time it is check for intersection. As for actually calculating these intersections, I'm not sure. There are probably a dozen ways to do that - given a point on the ray and the direction, you can check whether the point is closer to a grid
