There is a large market for wireless access points, among them small wireless access points used in homes or offices, as well as powerful wireless access points used in businesses, retail locations, and airports. One reason for the continued growth of the market for wireless access points is the arrival of so-called "hotspots"—standalone free wireless access points that are provided to customers or users of a particular service. Hotspots typically provide wireless service to customers or users by configuring a wireless network node as a wireless access point that provides wireless service to devices that are within range of the wireless network node. However, existing hotspot deployment technologies do not scale well to the new trends and complexities of the wireless hotspot market. When a small wireless access point is being used to provide wireless service to devices within an internal office network, or when a small wireless access point is being used as part of a small home network, it may be feasible to install and configure the small wireless access point using existing deployment and configuration technologies. However, when a large wireless access point is being used, or a hotspot is being deployed to service a large number of users in a large hotspot network, it is difficult to install and configure the large wireless access point using existing deployment and configuration technologies.
