A: Your post is not consistent with your question, so I'm going to give the answer to your question and then relate the root cause of your issue. You asked whether the following are valid and you quoted the expected result for each case: `a='C:\Users\User\Desktop\1a.txt' awk -v a='$a' '$0 ~ a {print}'` That is true for simple string matches. What you see above is just awk printing out the input line as the match condition is true. However, in your actual case where your data is array-based, it is more complex and you will need to implement awk to handle an array. Since your data is in an array, we are going to need to use a variable to store the list of files that we want to process: `filenames=(a b c) # this stores the file names` Now we are going to put the files into an array: `files=(${filenames[@]}) # This is the array that holds the input files # this stores the names of the array as a string (the default is to use the number of items in the array) files=${files[@]}) # This stores the string of the array as a string` Now for each array element in the files array, run awk: for filename in "${files[@]}"; # This iterates through the array `awk -v arr=$filename -v file=$filename -v pattern='pattern' '$0 ~ arr {print $0}' "$file" # This checks if the filename matches any element in the array # Do something with the matched element of the array ...` The rest of your code should be modified accordingly. One important point to note: Your real issue is not a `$0 ~ pattern`. It is the pattern of the input data. In your case `$0 ~ pattern` is true for all inputs. Thus, the real problem is that your `$0` doesn't match. Ass

This study examined the individual differences and stability in subjects' differential regulation of shame during exposure therapy for social phobia. The subjects (n = 35) were recruited from an outpatient clinic for the treatment of social phobia and completed the State Shame and Guilt Scale (SSGS) for each session of an 8-session course of in vivo exposure. The change in SSGS scores over the course of the treatment were then analyzed. Subjects with larger decreases in negative affect and negative cognitions, and smaller increases in positive affect and positive cognitions, showed larger decreases in shame scores during treatment, and larger increases in socially relevant behaviors. The SSGS is potentially useful for evaluating the effectiveness of exposure therapy for the treatment of social phobia.
