Carbon Monoxide Exposure Carbon monoxide poisoning is the leading cause of unintentional death by poisoning. The carbon monoxide (CO) in smoke is the single greatest contributor to CO-related deaths, accounting for approximately half of all unintentional poisoning deaths in the United States each year. CO poisoning is avoidable and a preventable illness, which can happen by breathing too much smoke or burning fuel for cooking or heating, especially in poorly ventilated buildings. Preventing the poisoning Carbon monoxide exposure can be avoided by not smoking or heating homes with gas or kerosene, and never using a furnace or stove without proper ventilation to expel combustion fumes. A charcoal barbecue or wood-burning grill is also a major source of CO, so CO poisoning is the leading cause of poisoning death from a charcoal-burning grill. Some people are more sensitive than others to CO and develop symptoms sooner than the others. For these people, the symptoms include: headache irritation and watering eyes difficulty breathing dizziness nausea, vomiting, diarrhea and stomach pain faintness and collapse In adults, the most serious symptoms begin within 30 minutes and can last from 8 to 24 hours. How to protect your family and others from poisoning People who smoke or burn charcoal indoors should use a vent with a CO detector as well as a smoke detector. A carbon monoxide detector should be placed on every level of a home. Check for dangerous levels of CO indoors using the Check Before You Cook tool. If you don't have a CO alarm, ask your insurance company for a CO monitor, which is available in many stores. To protect children from poisoning, install carbon monoxide alarms in every sleeping space, including bedrooms, daycare 595f342e71
