Structure of secreted human cartilage matrix proteins in vivo. The structure of secreted human articular cartilage matrix proteins was examined in vivo using immunofluorescence and immunohistochemical techniques. The results were compared to the current model of connective tissue proteoglycan structure in which the core protein is proposed to be hydrated. Human cartilage from osteoarthritic and other joint degenerations from 10 patients was examined. There was a heterogeneous staining pattern with respect to the incorporation of chondroitin sulfate and/or keratan sulfate oligosaccharides into the various components of the cartilage. While some cartilage regions stained intensely for one or more proteoglycans, other areas were devoid of detectable proteoglycan immunoreactivity. In addition, a varied number of cells were identified which were immunoreactive for the core proteins of aggrecan and biglycan but did not contain detectable immunoreactive proteoglycan. These observations were interpreted as being consistent with the in vivo presence of the core proteins of the chondroitin sulfate proteoglycan in cartilage and with the presence of core protein fibrils within the extracellular matrix. However, the apparent lack of proteoglycan immunoreactivity in many regions of cartilage was inconsistent with this current view of proteoglycan structure, suggesting that an alternative protein core is present in aqueous compartments within the extracellular matrix. Alternatively, the non-detectable proteoglycan staining may be due to the lack of a functional Golgi apparatus in these regions of the chondrocytes.[Treatment of aneurysms of the abdominal aorta with individual aortofemoral by-pass using a new device (author's transl)]. To facilitate an operative intervention in patients with abdominal aortic aneurysms, a new aortofemoral graft, developed by in collaboration with the Technit GmbH at Ulm, was introduced. This device permits to extend the segment of an aortic aneurysm suitable for the reconstruction, right up to the ankle, and it allows to treat the aneurysm without interfering with the intra-abdominal organs. The device, as well as its construction, are described in detail. While used in 3 patients the effectivity of the operation is demonstrated with angiographic data. The clinical results show that the device is very well tolerated and is suitable for operative intervention.

Share The UK Needs A New Economic Strategy The UK needs a new economic strategy The UK needs a new economic strategy The country is moving through some serious political and economic upheaval. Brexit has resulted in the UK being kicked out of the EU's single market, it is being pushed towards trade deals with the US and China, and the UK is in the middle of a housing crisis. There are signs, too, that the UK is losing its status as the financial centre of Europe. The chief executive of the UK's biggest bank, HSBC, has argued that the City is being "under-funded, under-staffed and no longer ahead of the curve on innovations". Amid the political and economic turmoil, it is a good time to reflect on why the UK is struggling economically. The country has benefited in recent decades from an unusually open trade policy that has seen it do well in global trade, according to data published by the Office for National Statistics. From 1996 to 2016, the UK's trade surplus grew from £6.4bn to £118bn, and it performed much better than most of its fellow G7 members – as well as most other OECD countries. Yet, since the Brexit vote, the UK's trade deficit has grown to £27.3bn in the first three months of 2018, compared to a trade deficit of £7.1bn in the same quarter of 2017, ONS data shows. The growth of the UK's trade deficit is a worrying sign for the country as trade is an important part of a country's wealth. It means that the UK is spending more on imports than it is on exports. The UK's economy is changing The big driver of the UK's trade deficit is changing. The country's trade surplus was largely based on services, which were cheaper in the UK than in the US. In the five years between 2012 and 2017, the size of the UK's services sector grew from 76% to 80% of GDP, according to Bank of England figures, and this has become a drag on the UK's trade surplus. The shift from a services-led economy to a goods-led one is creating difficulties for the UK. One of the reasons for the success of the City of London was that it was still a manufacturing base that could offer exports. Now, many of
